A History of Wallenpaupack's First School Houses

True to their New England origin, the first settlement on the Wallenpaupack valued the education of their children and employed a school teacher responsible for academic instruction. As noted in Don Coutts' Palmyra Township, Pike County, A History, "Mr Fry, one of the original Connecticut settlers, was the first schoolmaster in the young wilderness settlement; however, due to the lack of printed documentations, we do not know if he taught from his home, from his students' homes, or perhaps at the fort." The first school houses of Wallenpaupack were built as deemed necessary and existed in and out of use until the era of primary school consolidation in the early twentieth century, with the Paupack Consolidated School being the first primary school to replace the one-room school houses of colonial and post-colonial days.

Coutts states, "Palmyra Township's first known classroom was located on the Pellet property built before 1800 in the center of the farming community of Paupack.... The dilapidated stone foundation approximately 24' x 24' is still recognizable.... Nearby rests the remains of the little fresh water spring which fulfilled the needs for clear, cold drinking water.

"A second primitive schoolhouse built in the early years of the 1800s was located in the small unnamed settlement adjacent to the stone quarries along the trail between Tafton and Kimbles (Bear Run Road) near the Decker Swamp. This was known as the Purdy School, named for the schoolmaster who taught there, George Purdy.

"In 1834, The Free School Act established a system of free public education in Pennsylvania. The law established local school districts and permitted the levying of taxes to pay for elementary education. It was during this same period that mini-communities in Palmyra Township began to spring up around places of employment, usually a saw mill, a tannery or a stone quarry, and, in two instances, near the apex of several large farms. When ten or more school-age children resided in those neighborhoods, a school would be built within walking distance of that populace. Walking two or three miles to school was not at all uncommon and often necessary.

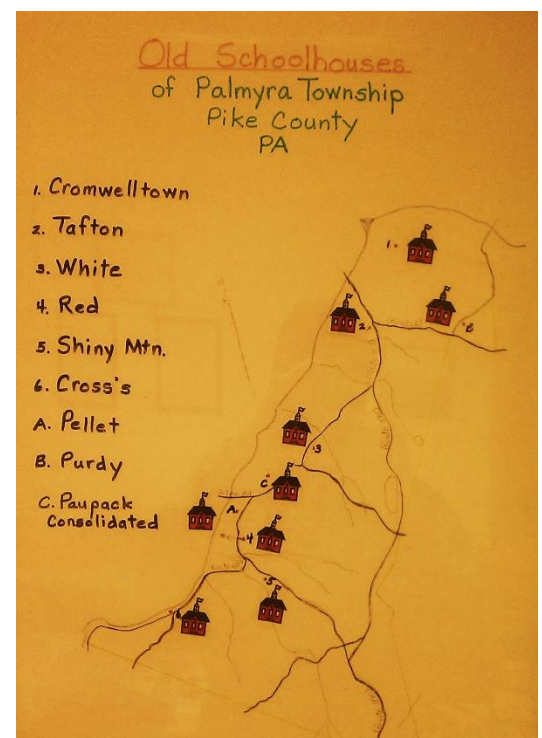

"In the year 1868, E. S. Decker, Pike County Superintendent of Schools wrote in part:

"There are fifty school houses in the county, all wood frame buildings. About ten percent are unfit for use. About forty have no out buildings... Books are a great obstacle to the progress of the schools, as very few have a good selection of books... The directors generally keep open the schools at such times when they will be most attended. Hence, there is no one time in the year in which all the schools are open...."

As noted in Coutts' History, Mary Waltz recalled her one-room school day experiences in an article published by a local newspaper:

"School was opened by repeating the Lord's Prayer, followed with a song, sometimes by pupils quoting a verse of scripture --- we liked to search out short verses. There were mottos on the walls --- one was 'do not tell a lie,' another 'do not steal - it is a sin to steal.' We had a fifteen minute recess at 10:30 and an hour for lunch. As we lived just around the corner from the school, we went home for lunch, hurrying back to join in the games or whatever. On Friday afternoons we had either spelling or arithmetic battles, or recitations. At times the teacher would read a story to us...."

Pictured at right, a map by Joan Glazier of Palmyra's one-room schoolhouses including the Paupack Consolidated School hangs in the Palmyra Township Municipal Building. The Tafton School (#2) closed in 1924 because it would soon be under the new Lake Wallenpaupack. The Paupack Consolidated School opened in September 1925, rendering all of the remaining one-room schoolhouses obsolete for academic instruction.
